Achievement motivation is a hypothetical construct designed to explain inter- and intraindividual differences in the orientation, intensity, and consistency of achievement behaviour. In adulthood also achievement motivation plays a crucial role in various aspects of human life. Achievement motivation is of special importance to educational psychologist because it is related to academic achievement and the correlation is positive and significant. Given any level of intelligence, if the achievement motivation is high, academic motivation is comparatively high. Even if a child got high intellectual potentials, he or she will not be able to get good grades if achievement motivation is low.

(05)

Achievement motivation is desire to accomplish, to do good job, or to do the best. It is drive to excel, succeed. And outperform others. It is a learned motive. Murray introduced this term in 1938 as a tendency to do something difficult as well and as quickly as possible.

1. What is achievement motivation?
2. Who coined this term?
3. Why is it important to be educational psychologist?
4. When is the academic achievement high?
5. Is achievement motivation a learned motive?
