Some insects live in group or colonies. Ants live like this and so do some wasps. Insects that live and work together are called social insects and one of the best-known social insects is the honeybee. There are many different kinds of bees and some live on their own. Honeybees, however, have been kept by men for hundreds of years for their honey. These insects will live happily in a specially made wooden box called a hive, so they are sometimes known as hive bees. In a hive of bees, there are a queen, some drones and thousands of workers. The queen is there to lay eggs and do nothing else. At certain times, she may lay up to 1500 eggs every day! The drones are male bees and they do not work. The workers do all the tasks of the hive. They look after the queen and each new larva that hatches from the eggs that she lays. They make layers of six-sided compartments, or cells, in which the eggs are laid and food stored. They keep the hive cool in summer if it gets too hot, by fanning it with their wings. They guard the hive so that no robber bees can get in, and gather food. In summer there is so much for the workers to do that they live only for about four or five weeks. The bees that start their lives in the autumn do not have to work so hard and usually live right through the winter. Bees can be found gathering food during summers. They fly from flower to flower collecting nectar, which is sweet and sugary, and pollen. Both nectar and pollen are used for food, but it is the nectar that the bees turn into honey. The bees suck the nectar into a special honey stomach, but the pollen is picked up on the hairs of the body as it creeps into the flower. It is then scraped off into a pollen basket on the outside of each back leg. They look like yellow lumps on the legs.
